Potentials for viral pneumonitis in workers exposed to endoscopy light were examined in an interdisciplinary experimental work (microbiological, immunological, epidemiological and clinical field). Endoscopic light seems to influence the upper airways. While the exposure to light did not result in a significant change of the cellular immune response (varicella zoster virus-neutralizing antibodies), a significant increase of the antibody titres in the serum samples was detected. However, it must be assumed that these antibodies do not help to protect the worker. A significant enhancement of the antibody titres in the serum samples was also detected after endoscopic light exposition of the worker. This fact may indicate a facilitated germ invasion, since antibodies are known to suppress the propagation of the virus in vitro (especially the complement fixing antibodies). The transmission of viruses by aerosols is more effective than the direct connection with the endoscopic light. In this context, more than 50 workers, who had been exposed to endoscopic light, were examined concerning the frequency and localisation of viral pneumonitis. [Correlation of the state of DNA and some enzymatic activity of the pancreas in the development of spontaneous recurrent aphthous stomatitis in rats]. The authors examined the development of the disease recurring aphthosis in rats with autoimmune background (by histopathologic, cytochemical, and immunochemical methods) and correlated it with the state of DNA and certain enzymatic activities of the pancreas. The data on DNA content in epithelial cells of salivary glands and the activity of granular, lysosomal, and several non-specific esterases in epithelial cells of the same salivary glands was established for each of the groups and for individual animals of the control and experimental ones. The effect of the disease on DNA content, enzyme activity, and the epitheliocyte staining in the salivary glands in rats with autoimmune background is clearly observed. The correlation coefficients of the disease development with the enzymatic and DNA parameters differ but are significant. The fact of the mutual association of the changes in the nuclei and epitheliocytes of the salivary glands with the activity of a certain enzyme is established. 0.9% salt diet, a 2.3% salt diet and a high fructose (HS) and high salt (HSS) diet. In the control group the rats received a 0.9% NaCl 0.6% saccharose diet, a 2.3% NaCl 0.6% saccharose diet and a HSS diet. The rats were euthanized at the 10th week. The urine samples were collected over 3 days from each rat. In a second experiment the rats were kept on a normal, moderate salt diet (0.3% salt) for 10 weeks. At the 10th week the urine samples were collected over 3 days. In the second experiment the rats were put on a 0.3% salt diet, a 2.3% salt diet and a HSS diet for 10 weeks. Urine samples were collected over 3 days at the 6th, 10th and 12th weeks. We have evidence that chymotrypsinogen B secretion from the liver increases with age in rats[@b30] and is higher after short term salt loading[@b31]. We therefore decided to use a large age range. Initially we planned to obtain the urine over two days but failed due to technical problems. However, our conclusions are supported by studies showing that
