Early on Friday morning, Quicken Loans employees were told they were no longer allowed to use the bathroom near the office and company bathrooms were closed to the public, they told The Verge. They described the work area as being locked in a “honey hole” for the weekend, and that “it’s basically where they leave their Friday paycheck.” Mona Martin, a Quicken Loans representative, told The Verge that the company is simply enforcing an existing locker room policy that it didn’t know was popular with employees until the Reddit thread about it went viral. The company tells employees they can use any bathroom on the second or third floors of the Renaissance Center. Martin described this policy as a “management decision.” A Quicken Loans employee wrote in a message to The Verge that the policy was implemented during the second week of July. The employees also described the situation in Detroit as surreal, saying they’ve never been so close to having no bathroom access. “This just came as a shock and there are plenty of other companies that allow us to use a bathroom near our office. We’ve never even thought about this and probably 95 percent of the companies that employ people in downtown Detroit do the same,” another wrote to The Verge. “These other companies, the ones who do this...do it on the road,” they added. A Quicken Loans representative told The Verge that it is simply enforcing an existing policy that it did not know was popular with employees until the Reddit thread about the situation went viral. The company did not provide a copy of the locker room policy to The Verge. A written statement from Quicken Loans is reproduced below. “We’re investigating this situation and are reaching out to affected parties to make sure the situation is resolved quickly,” the statement read. Quicken Loans employees describe the situation as a result of a newly implemented policy that they
